

Альянс громадського здоров'я: Відповідь на виклики, які спричинила агресія Росії в Україні Спеціальний випуск: Альянс у міжнародних медіа

З початку війни в Україні суттєво зріс інтерес міжнародних медіа до всього, що відбувається в нашій країні. Важливо, що не залишились осторонь і теми доступу до лікування ВІЛ та туберкульозу, замісної підтримувальної терапії, послуги з профілактики ВІЛ. У ситуації безпрецедентної агресії Росії, Альянс громадського здоров'я, знаходиться, як завжди, на передовій і намагається привернути увагу світу до цих проблем. Надаємо дайджест матеріалів у міжнародних медіа, де привертається увага до даних важливих питань і відзначається роль Альянсу та партнерів і відповіді на виклики, які спричинила агресія Росії в Україні.

Public Health Catastrophe Looms in Ukraine, Experts Warn

In Lviv, a city that has become a refuge for displaced Ukrainians, the alliance's staff members are delivering condoms, syringes and tests. But in many other cities, there is little the organization can do to help.

Staff members have lost contact with colleagues in Mariupol, the southern city under siege by Russian forces; only the coordinator of the alliance's mobile team called to confirm that she was alive. Staff members have also lost touch with 60 percent of their clients in the suburbs of Kyiv, which has been under attack for weeks.

"What has been gained over these 20 years can be destroyed in days," Dr. Klepikov said. "We will not allow this — we will fight for sustaining these gains."

Women who use drugs face particular stigma and discrimination from state organizations and medical institutions, said Tetiana Koshova, regional coordinator in Kyiv for the Ukrainian Network of Women Who Use Drugs. Before the war, the organization helped 50 to 70 women each month, but now that number has doubled, Ms. Koshova said. Ms. Koshova got her diagnosis of H.I.V. in 2006, at age 27, and said she worried about the availability of H.I.V. drugs as the war grinds on. Although warehouses still hold stocks of antiretroviral medicines, "the situation can change in any moment, because rockets fly anywhere and destroy everything indiscriminately," she said.

The article features a photograph of a white ambulance with a red cross on its side, parked on a dirt road in a war-torn area. The road is littered with debris, and several cars are visible in the background. The scene is set in a wooded area with tall trees.

Про щоденну нележку роботу Альянсу, спрямовану на забезпечення пацієнтів лікуванням пише Associated Press. Officials say the quiet work of the Alliance for Public Health shows how American assistance is reaching individuals in the besieged nation, on a different wavelength from U.S. diplomatic and military support for the Ukrainian government.

The Ukraine-based humanitarian organization has operated for more than 20 years. It has received millions of dollars from the U.S. Agency for International Development as well as the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and other federal programs to counter HIV globally.

Executive director Andriy Klepikov said shutting down was not an option during the invasion. Ukraine has one of the most serious HIV epidemics in Western Europe, and patients need their medications daily.

A website supported by the Alliance has become a place for patients to seek counseling for the trauma of war. According to one of the group's periodic situation reports, the top concerns of patients are acute stress, strong anxiety mixed with sadness, fear of death, guilt after evacuating to a safer area, and guilt about not doing enough.

"The importance of this work increases substantially in the context of war," said Klepikov.

The hard-won introduction of effective harm reduction services – led by civil society organisations like our partner in Ukraine Alliance for Public Health (APH) – has dramatically reduced the proportion of infections acquired through sharing needles and other injecting equipment. Indeed, thanks to APH and the community partners they work alongside, Ukraine had been a driving force for harm reduction compared to its neighbours in the region. But these types of services, vital though they are, are likely to be among the first jettisoned as the humanitarian crisis deepens.

In some cities, APH offices have been repurposed as shelters for marginalised groups, while the organisation's mobile HIV testing units are being deployed to deliver food and medicines, and in some cases to evacuate its clients and their families to safety. As the humanitarian crisis in Ukraine grows, APH is providing a lifeline to thousands of people, including many of those who may struggle to access humanitarian support.

HIV medication is running thin in Ukraine, which has one of the highest infection rates in Europe

Стаття у Daily Telegraph про те, як війна впливає на життя ВІЛ-позитивних людей в Україні.

Анастасія з Немішаєвого, що неподалік від Києва, довідалась про свій ВІЛ-статус перед самою війною. Зараз вона тимчасово проживає у Вінниці - і у неї залишилось небагато препарату. "Я не знаю, що мене вб'є першим - ВІЛ чи бомби», - каже Анастасія. Втім, нею опікуються соціальні працівники і все має бути добре.

«Це дуже страшно, коли починається бомбардування, люди мусять покинути дім за декілька хвилин, багато хто забуває ліки, – каже виконавчий директор Альянсу Андрій Клепиков. - Ми підрахували, що майже 100 000 ВІЛ-інфікованих (з них 59 000 отримують АРВ-терапію) живуть у районах, які постраждали від конфлікту. Найважче надати лікування тим, хто знаходиться на діючих військових територіях, де їх щодня бомбардують».

Ukraine war: Tens of thousands of people with HIV 'at risk' as medicine delivery disrupted by Russian attacks, charity says

Andriy Klepikov, from the Alliance for Public Health, told Sophy Ridge on Sunday that the Ukraine war has disrupted supplies of lifesaving treatments, adding that one of its vans had been shelled and two volunteers died.

Lives of HIV patients 'at risk'

Sky News: Ukraine war: Tens of thousands of people with HIV 'at risk' as medicine delivery disrupted by Russian attacks.

Andriy Klepikov, from the Alliance for Public Health, told 59,000 people are on antiretroviral therapy in areas affected by the war, and less than 40% managed to move outside of the war zones so we are talking about tens of thousands of people at risk. Mr Klepikov said: "People with HIV and TB were already vulnerable in normal life but during the war their vulnerability increased many times, and most of the people living with HIV are actually located in the eastern and southern part of Ukraine, affected by war the most."

Mr. Klepikov told about the deaths of two volunteers trying to continue delivering treatment during the Russian invasion: "It is a very challenging task... so it's not only governmental agencies and medical facilities but NGOs like mine delivering ART drugs to the patients, it's difficult and very challenging as we are continuing to do this even in occupied territories.

Medics and volunteers try to prop up Ukraine's health system

By Jennifer Rigby

Ukraine's Alliance for Public Health is helping patients with HIV/Aids, tuberculosis and hepatitis. Its ambulances are now delivering medicines and food, as well as evacuating people from heavily shelled areas such as the town of Irpin. The charity has also set up a helpline to ensure people can get the drugs they need. The Alliance's Inna Gavrylova came up with the idea after fleeing with her family to the relative safety of the Ivano-Frankivsk region in western Ukraine. "I could not sleep at night," she said, as she realised those in need of constant treatment were especially vulnerable.

Ukraine's drug runners risk it all to deliver medicines to the front line

"The safety of his drivers is a major concern for Pavlo Skala, policy director for Ukraine's biggest health-focused NGO, the Alliance for Public Health. Skala, a former police officer and U.N. peacekeeper, has seen his role change since the invasion. Now he manages APH's drug distribution operations, overseeing two-dozen drivers and 16 vehicles.

APH vans bring medicines from safe zones like Lviv, near Ukraine's western border with Poland, to cities like Kyiv and Lutsk. The vans were formerly mobile HIV and tuberculosis labs that have been converted to transport aid. Traveling in convoys of eight to 10 vehicles, each can carry a cargo of 2 metric tons. Supplies are dropped off at a hospital or city center, where local drivers pick them up and bring them closer to the front line. Skala said that deliveries included insulin for diabetics, cancer drugs and HIV medicines — as well as common drugs like paracetamol and ibuprofen. Medicines for people with chronic diseases, who could get sick or die without them, are a priority”.

War in Ukraine risks reversing gains in fight against HIV, tuberculosis

Fighting, chaos and refugee flows create the perfect conditions for spreading disease.

The hard-won gains made in recent years risk being swept away in days, said Andriy Klepikov, executive director of the Alliance for Public Health.

He leads the biggest health-focused nongovernmental organization operating in Ukraine. APH rolled out the country’s first opioid replacement program, key to getting drug users off street drugs and no longer sharing needles — a major avenue of HIV spread — and into health and social services systems.

The most immediate problem facing officials and activists working in public health is making sure that patients living with disease are able to get ahold of medicines they need.

“Most regions are already under fire and out of treatment medications, or with limited supply already,” said Pavlo Skala, an associate director at APH who is coordinating operations from the organization’s office in Kyiv.

However, the organization has found a new use for special armored vehicles intended for transporting methadone in an innovative project offering substitution therapy to clients in hard-to-reach areas. The U.S.-backed project never had time to get up and running, but with volunteer drivers the vans are evacuating besieged civilians trapped in towns near Kyiv, like Irpen, Bucha and Pushcha-Vodytsia, that are bearing the brunt of the Russian attack on the capital.

“They are going to dangerous places and evacuating people from there,” said Skala.

INFEKTIONSKRANKHEITEN

Krieg und Armut sind die Eltern der Tuberkulose

VON SONJA KASTILAN - AKTUALISIERT AM 25.04.2022 - 12:26

In der Ukraine sind jetzt auch kugelsichere Westen nötig, um Tuberkulose zu bekämpfen. Und in Deutschland bereiten sich die wenigen Spezialisten darauf vor, geflüchteten Patienten zu helfen.

Aus der Zentrale in Kiew musste er sich zurückziehen, jetzt hält Andriy Klepikov in Lwiw die Stellung – und via Internet Kontakt mit seinen siebzig Kollegen bei der „Alliance for Public Health“ und deren zahlreichen Partnern im In- und Ausland. Die ukrainische Hilfsorganisation hat sich der Bekämpfung von Aids und Tuberkulose, TB, verschrieben und ein Netzwerk mit rund 3000 Helfern aufgebaut, darunter Ärzte, Sozialarbeiter und Pflegepersonal, von denen Betroffene seit Jahren medizinisch betreut und psychologisch unterstützt werden. Mit dem ehrgeizigen Ziel, beiden Epidemien ein Ende zu setzen. Von einigen Helfern und Patienten ist bekannt, dass sie durch russische Angriffe zu Tode kamen, von anderen etwa in Mariupol fehlt noch jegliches Lebenszeichen.

He had to withdraw from the headquarters in Kyiv, and now Andriy Klepikov is holding the fort in Lviv – and is in contact via the Internet with his seventy colleagues at the “Alliance for Public Health” and their numerous partners at home and abroad. The Ukrainian aid organization is dedicated to fighting AIDS and tuberculosis, TB, and has built up a network of around 3,000 helpers, including doctors, social workers and nursing staff, who have been providing medical care and psychological support to those affected for years. With the ambitious goal of putting an end to both epidemics. It is known that some helpers and patients died as a result of Russian attacks, and there is still no sign of life from others, for example in Mariupol.

So instead of continuing the successes of recent years – further reducing infection rates of HIV or the tubercle bacillus, increasing the number of contacts traced or making sure that TB patients actually stick with their treatment, which 88 percent are now doing, where half used to be gave up – the “Alliance” is now taking on other roles. Among other things, they organize treatment in neighboring countries, distribute food packages or help with papers, and the manager comforts employees who were only able to save themselves from an attack with a backpack, and then found their apartment and car completely destroyed. “It’s not safe here in the West either,” Klepikov wrote last Thursday, sending a photo of a burned-out car to document the aftermath of a rocket attack. The alarm of the sirens is wearing, employees are scattered everywhere, some fled to Poland or Germany, which overrides the usual geographical order for the virtual meetings since the Corona pandemic, but they keep going.

Guerre en Ukraine : les maladies infectieuses, bombe à retardement

Covid, sida, tuberculose, rougeole, polio... Un cortège de maladies, déjà présentes avant la guerre, pourrait prospérer dans le chaos. Décryptage d'une menace encore invisible.

« Nous sommes toujours sous le choc. Personne ne s'attendait à cette guerre. ». Andriy Klepikov, directeur exécutif de l'Alliance internationale contre le HIV/sida en Ukraine, l'une des plus grandes organisations dédiées à la lutte contre cette maladie en Europe de l'Est, accuse le coup. En temps de paix, il a déjà fort à faire : l'Ukraine est le deuxième pays de la région le plus touché par l'épidémie de VIH, après la Russie. Depuis le début de l'agression russe, ses col-

«We are still in shock. No one expected this war. - Andriy Klepikov, executive director of the International HIV/AIDS Alliance in Ukraine, one of the largest organizations dedicated to the fight against this disease in Europe from the East, accuses the blow. In peacetime, he already has a lot to do: Ukraine is the second country in the region most affected by the HIV epidemic, after the Russia

Since the start of the Russian aggression, he and his colleagues have been striving to carry out their missions of prevention and care for the 260,000 HIV-positive people in the country. And this under nightmarish conditions and, until recently, still unimaginable: on April 11, the World Health Organization (WHO) recorded more than 100 attacks against health establishments in Ukraine. More than 40 of them, who provided prevention, treatment and anti-HIV care for thousands of patients, had to lower the curtain.

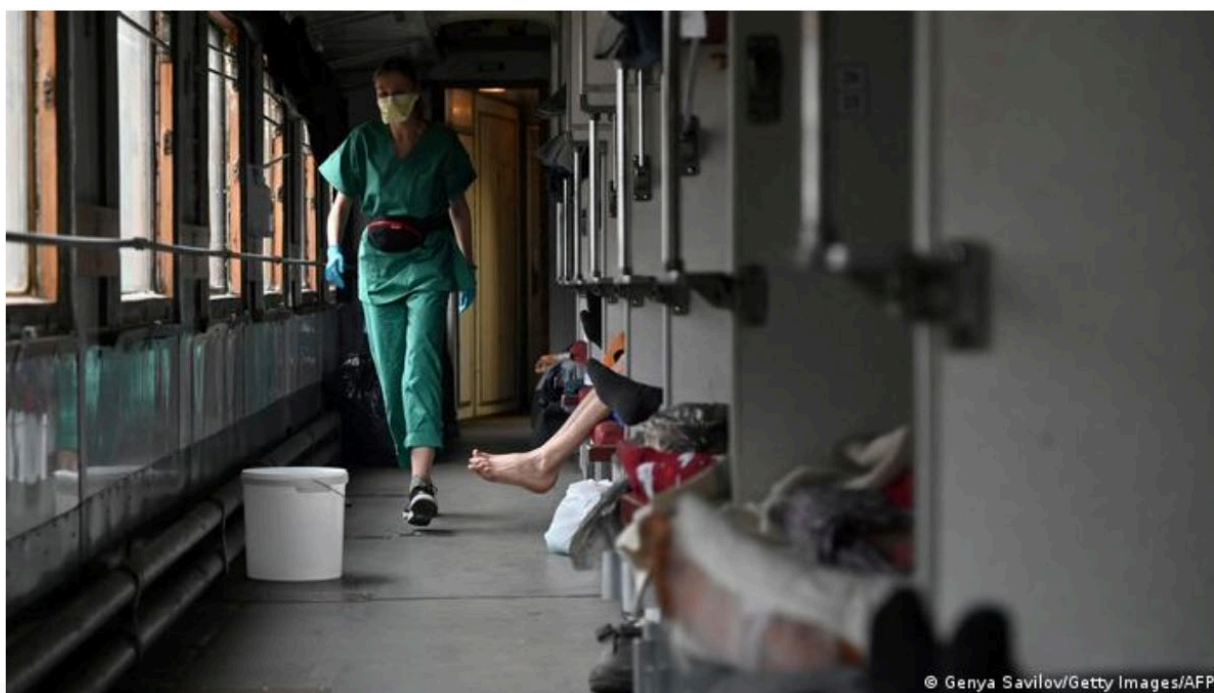

For patients, in regions controlled by the Russians, or under their fire, access to treatment is now an obstacle course. There is, however, an emergency. "Before the war broke out, the patients received their medication for one, two months, at most. We are more than fifty days into the war. They don't have any more or almost no more," alarms Andriy Klepikov from Lviv, in the west of the country. In the event, associations can count on their international partners: thanks to the Emergency Plan of the President of the United States for the fight against AIDS (Pepfar, President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief), a first delivery of more than 18 million doses of antiretroviral drugs – the reference treatment for HIV/AIDS – arrived in Lviv on 6 April. The count is good: the stocks will be enough to cover the needs of Ukrainians living with HIV for six months.

HIV drugs have reached Ukraine. But that's not the end of the problem

The Alliance for Public Health, a partner of the Global Fund, started distributing drugs for people under opioid agonist treatment.

The work is challenging, and at times life-threatening. In certain regions, or oblasts, deliveries are only possible with the help of volunteers. In particular areas, deliveries are being made secretly, and some NGOs would rather not discuss them for fear of jeopardizing the little openings they have to get medicines there, and to ensure the safety of their volunteers.

Andriy Klepikov, executive director of Alliance for Public Health, one of the largest NGOs in Ukraine focused on HIV and tuberculosis programs, told Devex the situation became even more difficult for many of the people they were assisting before the war. So in addition to the usual core package of services they provide, they're also trying to assist these people in response to other needs, such as documentation, housing, transportation, or even evacuation. But he said resources are limited, as they are still working with the same level of resources as they did before the war.

"In such a situation, we are hoping that more resources will be provided, in addition to some flexibilities [already provided] by some donors like the Global Fund," he said.

Russia's invasion of Ukraine threatens HIV response

"There are ART drugs in Ukraine", Zahedul Islam, Director of Treatment at the Alliance for Public Health NGO, told The Lancet HIV. "But they are just not available in some places, for instance warehouses where they are stored are not accessible due to security problems, or infrastructure damage makes them inaccessible."

Islam said discussions were underway between the Ukrainian government and other organisations, including APH, on creating an external supply of drugs that could be stored in a safe location and given to patients. .

However, despite the difficult situation they are in, some are refusing to give up on providing services, especially support services such as harm reduction. Павло Скала, Policy Director at APH, is still working in Kyiv, handing out syringes and condoms to anyone that needs them. He says he knows this is no more than a basic prevention service, and a fraction of the services he and others at APH provided before the invasion, which included mobile testing, OAT, and other support for key vulnerable populations, but he can do little else. He now spends much of his time delivering humanitarian aid and helping evacuate people in danger zones. "It's basically just running a survival operation here. We are helping anyone we can—relatives and children of our clients, basically anyone. We aren't checking the HIV status of people we are helping", he told The Lancet HIV.

В статті Альянс громадського здоров'я та партнери з Донецької обласної організації Товариства Червоного Хреста України діляться своїм досвідом роботи з протидії ТБ та підтримки людей з туберкульозом в умовах війни протягом останнього місяця, а також пересторогами, які вбачають в нинішніх обставинах.

So in addition to the usual core package of services they provide, they're also trying to assist these people in response to other needs, such as documentation, housing, transportation, or even evacuation. But he said resources are limited, as they are still working with the same level of resources as they did before the war.

"In such a situation, we are hoping that more resources will be provided, in addition to some flexibilities [already provided] by some donors like the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria," he said.

The Ukraine-based humanitarian organization has operated for more than 20 years. It has received millions of dollars from the U.S. Agency for International Development as well as the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and other federal programs to counter HIV globally.

11:11 "Dvije osobe poginule su u napadu na vozilo humanitarne pomoći", rekao je Andriy Klepikov, izvršni direktor Saveza za javno zdravstvo. Njegova organizacija isporučuje lijekove za HIV pacijente i nastavlja to činiti čak i na okupiranim područjima.

On je u nedjelju rekao da je takav zadatak postao opasan, ispričavši kako je vozilo partnerske organizacije koje je prevozilo volontere i pomoć granatirano na putu prema Černihivu.

Во время родов из-за пандемии украинское правительство начало выплачивать лекарства от ВИЧ и туберкулеза в течение трех месяцев. Однако многие украинцы, которые были вынуждены покинуть свои разрушенные города, смогли взять только ограниченные запасы лекарств, необходимых для выживания. Считается, что по меньшей мере 1200 человек с туберкулезом покинули Украину.

Альянс за общественное здравоохранение, некоммерческая организация, помогает более чем 400 из этих пациентов в таких странах, как Польша и Молдова. ВОЗ также подготовила резерв противотуберкулезных препаратов в Польше для беженцев из Украины. Но большинство беженцев - женщины и дети, в то время как большинство украинцев с лекарственно-устойчивым туберкулезом - мужчины, которые должны оставаться в стране и бороться, по словам Андрея Клепикова, исполнительного директора альянса.

В стране члены Альянса доставляют лекарства крупнейшим в городах, где все еще можно путешествовать, и отправляют лекарства по почте в общины, где все еще работают почтовые отделения.

Более одного из четырех новых случаев ВИЧ-инфекции в Украине происходит среди примерно 350 000 потребителей инъекционных наркотиков

в стране. До войны украинская политика снижения вреда позволила более 17 000 своих граждан получить так называемую опиоидную заместительную терапию.
